James Trotta-Bono highlights a growing sector of America's avant-garde who share a strong connection to their Native American ancestry. But unlike their artistic predecessors whose subject matters are familiar - the sunset mesas, clusters of teepees, native headdresses and heroic profiles, or iconographic styled blankets and wondrous coiled baskets - these contemporary artists create their paintings, sculptures, baskets, even poetry using mediums, materials, and techniques in remarkable and unique ways. Join us in this adventure in artistic expression that springs from the well of their artistic heritage but pours forth in a multitude of form and fashion.
